Not illustrated. 1880 Excerpt: . lam hungry isfaifaim, what is the French of he is hungry, you are hungry, are you hungry? etc. The solution of these questions is a logical consequence for any one who knows the French verb etre (to be). With a thorough knowledge of the conjugations and the pronunciation, these oral compositions may be entered upon at any period of the study. If regularly practised at short intervals, they will gradually be delivered with greater decision and fluency; and a close association will soon be established between the thought and the phrase, which fixes the latter in the mind and begets the faculty of reproducing it spontaneously, of thinking aloud, as it were, in the foreign language. Translation, in oral expression, is attended with the same inconvenience which is attached to it in the first two arts, from the want of identically co-responding terms in the...
